

Acknowledgments

This monograph could not have been written without the support of many individuals. I am especially indebted to Randall Kesselring, who gave training in the use of data editor software and the extraction of public use microdata. Professor Kesselring also assisted on econometric matters and with the Gini ratio estimates that appear in Chapter 7. A number of persons read parts of the manuscript and/or listened to presentations drawn from various chapters and provided valuable comments. These include Eric Tymoigne, Ron Stanfield, Christopher Niggle, John Hall, Anne Mayhew, Fred Lee, Eric Hake, John Watkins, John Henry, Reynold Nesiba, John Wisman, Martha Starr, Robert Prasch and Janet Knoedler. Thanks are due to James Washam for explaining credit derivatives and hedging strategies used by institutional portfolio managers.

I am grateful to the Arkansas State University Faculty Research Committee, which approved my application for research leave in the spring semester 2007. Thanks also to the College of Business Faculty Development Committee and Dean Len Frey for providing summer research grants in 2005, 2006 and 2007. I hope that the present work provides evidence of money well spent.
