Acknowledgements

I would like to acknowledge with the deepest thanks all of the fellow authors that have made this Handbook possible. Not just because they spent energy writing their chapters, but much more for their collegiality and the inspiration they bring to the work of sustainable transport.

I am delighted to collaborate with Phil Goodwin on the final chapter in this Handbook – he was there in the early days of my career in this field (recollections of the Great Transport Debate at the Sheldonian Theatre, Oxford), was responsible for research that would highlight the need for a different approach to transport policy, and it is fitting that he and I conclude with our thoughts on where next. I am very happy that Susan Handy accepted my invitation to lead Part III of the book – her research was critical to my own research inquiries. Susan has a way of articulating complexity in a way that can be understood by many. Luca Bertolini has also played a significant role in my thinking over many years, we met at the inaugural World Planning Schools Congress (WPSC) – noticing that we were bridging many streams seeking out those that focused on land use transport integration. Nick Low initiated my pathway into institutional barriers and governance – also triggered by conversations at the same WPSC. Highlighting these four colleagues should not diminish the importance of the other authors – each hold an important place in my world. Several ventures enabled me to develop links with them over the years – the Research Centre for the Governance and Management of Urban Transport (Nick Low, Crystal Legacy, John Stone, Imran Muhammed, John Whitelegg, Leigh Glover, Fredrik Pettersson-Löfstedt); The AESOP Transport Group and the COST Action Accessibility Tools in Planning Practice (Enrica Papa, Cecilia Silva, Ren Thomas, Marco te Brömmestroet, Paul Chorus, Petter Næss, Dimitris Milakis, Anders Larsson, Erik Elldér, Deike Peters, Dorina Pojani, Rob Hickman, Dries Gysels); the Planning and Transport Research Centre WA (Sharon Beirmann, Kirsten Martinus); the World Society of Transport Land Use Research (Kevin Krizek, Corinne Mulley, Jen Kent, Becky Loo); Guest Professor at K2 The Swedish Knowledge Centre for Public Transport (Helena Svensson, Karolina Isaksson, Daniel Firth, Iain Docherty). The others not associated with these specific ventures have been people who have inspired me on the journey.

I acknowledge my colleagues at Curtin University, those who enable me to contribute in the way that they do – and of course, a special mention to fellow authors Courtney Babb, Jan Scheurer and Sam McLeod, also at Curtin University.

Finally I acknowledge those closer to home – my family (both human and canine!) who offer important support away from the world of academia and practice.
